

5. Regime shifts in social-ecological systems over historical time: examples from France

Carole Crumley

I apply a historical perspective to a the classic example of 'collapse.' The Western Roman Empire demonstrates the utility of studying a well-documented example by following long, slow variables that encompass many dimensions (e.g., climate change, social change, agricultural innovations, etc), paying particular attention to the relation between ruptures in socio-ecological memory and regional resilience.